FAREWELL.

Quick, cut me the least fittle curl It is heavy with perfumes and wet; We will part, for it must be, my girl, When our lips, for once more, have met.

Say, say of our leve that 'twas strong, You may boast that it lasted a week; Pat! its memory, busied so long, Of corruption already must speak.

Alas! 'tis a pity: your sorrow Those soft eyes have reddened with pain; You may weep, child, to day; for to-morow, New love will bring laughter again.

I fly with the breezes; I go-Go whither? Ah! you may forbode! But nev r more, child, this I know, With your smile will you lighten my load.

In the lanes which the wild blossoms bless A sweeter wild rose will I seek; Whether thegers than thine may caress, And breathe on a better loved cheek And, to-morrow, all fluished and done,

It my youth is as tresh and gay,
I will open my heart for the sun
To heat up the wounds of to-day,

NOW GIRLS!

This is the Kind of Bridegreem an Old Backelor will Make.

I am still married, says Prentice Mulford in the San Francisco Bulletro, and intend remaining so for some months to come. But marriage is a fearful and risky business. No one knows what may turn up on either side. Temper and temperment are such peculiar things. However, all as yet is quiet on the Potomae. The marriage service has never been fully written out. People who marry don't know what they are promising. The bond should read: "You promise to take this man or this woman for hife; you must not after this walk or talk
